Manager's Commentary

The start of this year did bring some risk with it. From inflation to geopolitical risks, the US stock market was gripped with fear for a short period in January, with the major indices registering double digit declines from their all-time highs recorded in Q4 2021, before staging a partial recovery into month end.

The downward spiral started with the release of FOMC minutes on January 5th which added to the already hawkish tones emanating from Fed Chairman Powell following the FOMC meeting. The Fed, in their communications, have made "price stability" their only concern at this point. With the labour market running hot and labour market participation rate low, the Fed's primary concern is inflation getting entrenched in the pricing cycle. However, we also note that despite inflation sitting at elevated levels and likely to go higher, particularly at home in UK, we are beginning to observe indications of some pressures starting to ease. With US 5 and 10-year breakeven inflation indicators sitting around 2.8%, the market certainly expects a moderation in inflation looking further ahead. Indeed, we expect supply chain bottlenecks to ease significantly as we progress through the year, and base effects are likely to bring down the headline inflation figures beginning in quarter two this year.

The Fed Chair J Powell also clarified their position on the Quantitative Tightening and that the preferred route is to let the debt run to maturity. The Fed's hawkish tone took the stock market by surprise and that led to a quick re-rating growth stock. The market also envisages some risk of monetary policy tightening into a slowing economy. The key now is the growth numbers for the rest of the year.

In the so-called emerging world, the People's Bank of China have now cut rates twice in consecutive months after GDP contracted sharply following the further lockdowns and hit to the property sector. We expect an upward rebound in growth and equity valuations as the economy reopens and a reopening China will also help to pull back inflationary pressure in the West. In Europe, Germany has also seen recession looming and with inflation pushing above 5% across the EU the ECB has had to adopt a slightly more cautious tone too, although it's more likely that liquidity will be tapered back first, and rate rises are still likely some way off. The UK market has performed well, aided by better prospects for banks and mining stocks benefitting from commodity inflation globally.

The Technology, Healthcare and Clean Energy sectors were hit hard during the month. All three registering a double-digit drop. The UK, European and Chinese equities fared relatively better than their US counterparts. Portfolios have been buffered by January volatility which is now ebbing away. All portfolios remained inside their allocated risk corridors during the month. We anticipate markets moving higher before we contemplate our next move whilst retaining a clear and vivid focus on the risks in play.
